S. P. EMPLOYEE LOSES HIS HAND

Oliver J. Davis of Weston,
Idaho, Injured at Pigeon
Gravel Pit

Oliver J. Davis, an employee of the Southern Pacific company at Pigeon Pit, Utah, had his right hand crushed and later removed late Monday afternoon, under the wheels of a freight car, according to information given office here.

Davis was employed in one of the railroad gravel pits. He was crossing the railroad tracks, directly in front of a standing car, when a switch engine attached to a string of cars, bore down upon him.

Falling to the ground near the rails to avoid being struck, Davis tried to roll from danger, but his hand was caught under the wheel of the oncoming train and badly mangled.

The injured man was brought to Ogden on train No. 29 and taken to the Dee hospital. His hand was amputated just above the wrist.

Davis' home is at Weston, Idaho.

ANYWHERE IN AMERICA By Ethel Searles.

Our little house is drowning in the sun. The summer afternoon has just begun. And all the world around our yard is done. The shaded windows look like half-closed eyes. The air is mist with wings of butterflies. Our kitten sleeps, immune from rough surprise.

The empty swing moves gently in the breeze. One glimpses now the farmer through the trees. The lazy cows seek shelter where they please. But there—I heard a laugh, a certain flap. A jolly laugh, a screen door loudly snap. The children in our house have had their nap.
